

PHILOSOPHY 446: SOCIAL AND POLITICAL PHILOSOPHY OF LANGUAGE
WINTER 2017

Professor Eric Swanson
ericsw@umich.edu, 2259 Angell Hall
Office hours: TBD

In what ways do uses of language harm people, and how? How does language affect our thought about society and politics? And how does language affect our ability to communicate, understand each other, and reach consensus when we discuss potentially divisive social and political issues?

In this course we will investigate possible answers to these questions. We will discuss many concrete examples in which uses of language harm people, and in which language affects thought and discourse. For example, we will discuss slurs, hate speech, sexist and racist essentializing language, 'dogwhistles,' metaphors, obfuscatory language in politics, and propaganda. These examples will help us develop and evaluate general, abstract theories and ways of thinking about socially and politically important language. We can thereby work toward better appreciating and understanding the force of language when we encounter it in other settings.

EXPECTATIONS

Keep up with the readings. They demand close attention and careful thought, and we'll often look back to readings from earlier in the semester. If you fall behind you'll miss much of what's going on.

We'll be discussing many controversial issues in this course, and challenging our beliefs throughout. Be respectful, charitable, and considerate in discussion.
