

An examination of Wittgenstein's criticisms of Frege and Russell's view that laws of inference (Schlussgesetze) in some way "justify" inferences. I argue that what lies behind this criticism is an illuminating criticism of Frege and Russell's conceptions of logical entailment. In the course of making this case, I explore in detail Russell's dispute with Bradley on the question whether all relations are "internal".